Architecture:

One-story, roughly rectangular-plan, side-gabled stone veneered house with minimal Tudor Revival detailing, especially in the prominent front-gabled bay containing the principal entry. battered stone exterior chimney to the left of the principal entry, and single and paired 1:1 fenestration, some with a diamond-shape in the upper “sash.” The stone veneer on the house is said to have come from the Dawson family properties further south near Manchaca, Texas.

Historical Associations:

Staff believes the house was built around 1937, although the property owner believes it is earlier than that, and dates from before 1920. Staff’s determination of the date of construction is based upon the occupancy records from city directories, the water service permit for this address dating from 1937, as well as the architectural style of the house, which is consistent with a 1930s construction date.

Building permit to Nicholas A. Dawson for the construction of this house as well as the house at 901 Dawson Road.

However, the discrepancy in the possible dates of construction for this house do not overshadow its importance to the history of South Austin, as the house was built by the Dawson family, and remained in the family until being sold to the current owner in the 1970s.

Nicholas Dawson was born in Pennsylvania, and led a very colorful life. At the age of 19, he left home and moved to Lexington, Missouri, where he built a cabin and obtained work as a teacher. He then decided to go to California in 1841, then to Veracruz, Mexico in 1843 before returning to Pennsylvania. He moved to Arkansas to teach school in 1846, and married a former pupil named Margaret Wright. He and his brother-in-law then went to California again during the Gold Rush, but decided that he would rather live in Texas. He and Margaret moved to Austin in 1851 and purchased land out of the Isaac Decker League in South Austin.

Beginning in the 1880s, Dawson became a home builder, constructing homes in what is now the West Line National Register Historic District on W. 9th and W. 10th Streets, including several landmarked structures. Dawson's signature style was a one-story stone house with typical architectural embellishments of the time. His children got involved in the family business, and continued to build homes and develop new areas of the city after Nicholas Dawson passed away in 1903. In particular, the Dawson children focused on South Austin near Bouldin Creek, where they built several of the archetypal stone houses that are now city historic landmarks in the 1880s and 1890s. Dawson's son, Nicholas A. Dawson, who apparently went by Nick, was the principal force in the family's development of South Austin neighborhoods, including South Heights, which was platted in 1894, and is located where Dawson Road is now. Nick Dawson also got his children involved in the family enterprises, and gave them land for their livelihoods. Especially noteworthy was the fact that Nick Dawson gave land to his daughters as well as to his sons, ensuring that his daughters would have their own incomes from the sale or construction of rental properties on their land.

The house at 905 Dawson Road, which staff believes was built in 1937, was on property that was devised from Nick Dawson to his children, in particular, two daughters, Ruth Dawson (later Ruth Dawson Tinnin) and Jane Dawson (later Jane Dawson Parker). The 1937 water permit for this house shows N.A. (Nick) Dawson as the applicant; the 1939 sewer service application for this address references ownership by Jane D. (Dawson) Parker. At some point, Jane Dawson Parker turned over the ownership of this property to her sister Ruth, in whose family the property remained until the 1970s, when it was purchased by the current owner.

This house, as well as the house at 901 Dawson Road (demolished in 2015) were two of the Dawson family houses that were built as rental properties. Both houses featured a stone veneer exterior, harkening back to the stone houses built by Nicholas Dawson in Old West Austin and by N.A. and Nannie Dawson in South Austin at the turn of the century. Ruth Dawson Tinnin lived in Louisiana and San Antonio for much of the mid-20th century, but retained this house as a rental property, providing her with income. It is important to note that the Dawsons built (and rented) these houses for middle class families. Their earlier houses in Old West Austin were large houses for the upper class, but these houses in South Austin were smaller, more modest, and more suited for working- and middle class families. A review of the occupancy history of this house from 1937 onward reflects the family's philosophy – their tenants, some of whom stayed renters in this house for long periods of time, included a mail carrier, a painter and his beauty-shop owning wife (she had her beauty shop on this property), carpenters, and plumbers. Beginning around 1943, the house was rented by Catherine A. Hamilton, who was probably either separated or divorced, and worked as a telephone operator for many years. Catherine Hamilton lived here until the mid-1950s. A contractor for Nash-Phillips-Copus rented the house in the late 1950s, the then from around 1960 until around 1970, it was rented by Lee S. and Mary A. Lewis. He was a heavy equipment operator for a construction company. There were other renters in the 1970s, including the current owner, who purchased the house from the niece of Ruth Dawson Tinnin, in 1977.

TINNIN, Mrs. Ruth Dawson, 84, 7709 Manchaca Road, died Tuesday. Graveside services 2 p.m. Thursday at Masonic Cemetery. Survivors: daughters, Mrs. Elizabeth Tinnin Moore, Mrs. J.S. (Mary Jane) Ramsey, both of Austin; son, Dawson Tinnin of Austin; brother, Joe J Dawson of Austin; six grandchildren; ten great-grandchildren. (Wilke-Clay)

DAWSON-TINNIN / ALLBRIGHT HOUSE at 905 DAWSON RD.

Even a cursory glimpse by a fair-minded citizen would seem to come to an obvious conclusion. On its face, a beautifully intact stone house built almost a century ago by one of the most prominent families in the city's history would appear to be an appropriate if not an obvious choice for historical preservation status.

To boot, an extensive 2015 survey undertaken by Preservation Central, Inc. of the Bouldin Creek Neighborhood Association Historic Resources has indicated that of the nearly seven hundred "cultural resources" pre-dating 1965 in the area, this particular house is on a very short list of twenty-five houses (some since demolished) that were rated "high preservation priorities." But when the history and details surrounding this house are examined, the story becomes far more compelling.

Before Nicholas "Cheyenne" Dawson finally settled in South Austin in 1851, he had already been to California and back three times. The first time was as a member of the John Bidwell Western Emigration Society as they literally blazed a new trail through the deserts and over the mountains as the first emigrant party to travel overland to California. He also returned West as an original '49er during the California Gold Rush. Dawson chronicled his adventures in <Narrative of Nicholas "Cheyenne" Dawson (Overland To California in '41 & '49, and Texas In '51)>, a classic of that era which is cited in no less than thirty-five subsequent sources on the topic.

The Pennsylvania native supported himself primarily by teaching school in various locales during his travels. He would later marry one of his former students, Margaret Wright, while in Arkansas. Once settled in Austin in 1851 the couple would raise their family here and become landowners of 100 acres of the Isaac Decker League (4428 acres) in what is now considered the Bouldin Creek neighborhood. The land was originally granted to Decker on 3/17/1835 by the Republic of Mexico (Book No. 16, p. 177, General Land Office State of Coahuila, Texas). Dawson paid $314 for his 100 acres.

In addition to teaching, Dawson was also a builder and the family would eventually develop much of this area and other parts of the city in subsequent years. Nonetheless, the Dawson family would make their homestead a bit farther south at what is currently 7709 Manchaca Rd. "Cheyenne" and Margaret would have four surviving children: Mary Jane ("Mollie"), born in 1853; Nancy Elizabeth ("Nannie"), born in 1858; Nicholas Amos, born 1864; and Margaret Isabelle ("Belle"), birth date unknown. Two other children died in early childhood.

Not much has been documented about Belle other than she married a gentleman named Daniel for which the South Austin street is named. We do know that Mollie and Nannie would follow in their father's footsteps, becoming educators and, later, developers. In fact, Mollie organized and became principal of the first public school in South Austin, the current Fullmore Middle School. Mollie Dawson Elementary School on So. First St. is named in her honor as is Mary St. in 78704. She also started two private schools in downtown Austin in the early 1890s.

Meanwhile, Nicholas would receive a Mechanical Engineering degree in the first graduating class from Texas A&M and then graduated from the University of Texas Law School. He served one term in the 22nd Texas State Legislature, 1891-92, in the Hogg Administration. But according to an interview in the Austin American Statesman in February, 1987, N.A.'s daughter-in-law, Audrey Swank Dawson, stated that "he decided he didn't like law or politics and started building roads and courthouses." This refers to the courthouse and city block he built in Orange, Texas in the very first years of the new century.

About a decade before this venture in Orange, N.A. would marry Jennie D. Davis, who was a Daughter Of The Republic, from another land-owning, Texas pioneer family. In 1891, they were given property by her father, J.J. Davis, making their combined land holdings one of the largest in the area.

It was sometime during the mid-1890s that these three Dawson children, along with their father, started to make inroads as developers in what is now known as the West Line Historic District. According to the U.S. Department of Interior's National Register of Historical Places, prior to the Dawsons' work, almost all of the early houses in this West Austin neighborhood (built largely from 1870-1895) "were individual efforts constructed with little or no consideration for neighboring design or building types. Lots and blocks were developed piecemeal and varied from architect-designed brick mansions to more modest frame houses."

Conversely, the Dawsons' Silliman Subdivision on W. 10th and W. 11th streets, built between 1894-98, was, according to the aforementioned U.S. National Registry, "the first sustained building campaign in the West Line Historic District. The Houses shared similar designs, materials, size, height and scale. Lot size and setback was consistent and the resulting streetscapes convey an orderly, planned appearance."

Examples include the Edward F. Nicolds House (1106 W. 10th St.), the McBride-Knudsen House (1109 W. 10th St.) and the Brass-Goddard House (1108 W. 9th St.). These homes, according to Dawson's obituary in the Austin American Statesman, dated 7/7/39, were described as "significant beyond evident craftsmanship."

A bit earlier, starting in 1890, before the building campaign in West Austin and according to Travis County records, "Cheyenne" and Margaret began transferring land by deed to their children. This Bouldin Creek area is often referred to as South Heights and the Dawson children, 35 y.o. Mollie, 32 y.o. Nannie and 26 y.o. Nicholas Amos, would begin developing parts of this Isaac Decker League for the rest of their lives.

It is here, before the turn of the century, that the Dawsons built a number of Victorian style limestone houses. These dwellings were targeted for single family, middle class owners and were considerably more modest than the homes they were building in the West Line District. These houses were built of stone quarried from the old Dawson farm in Manchaca. Only four of these historic South Heights homes remain today.

In 1892 son N.A. Dawson would begin work in this South Austin area on what was planned as a grand family mansion to be built on the site that is now the High Road on Dawson, formerly the Elks Lodge. Due to various complications over the years, including local and nationwide economic downturns like the Depression of 1893, Dawson was never able to complete the mansion and his daughter, Ruth Dawson Tinnin, would eventually sell that piece of property to the Elks Lodge around 1960.

Literally a stone's throw away, across the strip that would become Dawson Rd. some forty years later, is the site of the next phase of the family's development plans for South Heights.

According to local records the area was platted in 1894 and dedicated for "free use to public streets and alleys in the division of lots and blocks in the 44 acres."

The first two homes, sometimes referred to as "cottages," were built here at the eventual addresses, 901 and 905 Dawson Rd. There seems to be some question as to when these two dwellings were actually constructed. Travis County Archival Tax records from 1917-18 indicate an increase in land valuation to imply that "improvements," such as these two homes, had been added to the property. The two houses first officially appear in the tax records in 1925; however, the present owner, Veronica Allbright, was told by Ruth Dawson Tinnin in 1975 that these houses date back to the turn of the century with 901 being the older of the two homes. The house at 901 Dawson Rd. was demolished in 2015.

These two homes were built as rental properties with the working class family in mind. The house at 905 Dawson Rd. featured modern amenities such as indoor plumbing for bathrooms and a kitchen area that the aforementioned Victorian-styled homes they had built previously in the neighborhood did not possess. This was a "transitional house form" for the era that has a distinctive peaked front roof. The roof was initially composed of shake shingles, found underneath three layers of more modern composites.

This house had a small kitchen with two wall cupboards between a small double hung window above a sink with a wall faucet. The kitchen had three doorways: one to the outside, one to the small hallway and a third to the dining room. This dining area was next to the living room which still has a fireplace on the front-center wall. To the left is the front door and on the adjoining wall is a door to access the front bedroom and the downstairs bathroom.

The upstairs is basically one room with two double-hung windows and a small workable window in a gabled section above the front door. Another gabled area leads to a flat-roofed patio that can be accessed through a "pony" door. A bathroom with the original claw-foot tub and a toilet are also on the second floor. Hardwood pine floors are upstairs with oak floors downstairs.

A back porch room was added at some undisclosed point in time. The room's walls are made of rock with a cement floor and a wooden beam ceiling. There are six double-hung windows and two outside doors on opposite ends. The room had gas and washer hookups.

This "rock room" could be completely closed off from the rest of the house and the outside elements but it could freeze in very cold weather. A third door opened to the inside hallway and the stairs. This small hallway had three other doors, to the kitchen, to the bedroom and to the third step of the staircase. In cold weather this was helpful in heating specific areas.

A separate detached one-and-a-half-story building on the property was built for a motor vehicle and was constructed of the same material as the house. This "garage" also featured a separate workroom with two doors facing each other, one to the outside and the other to the garage. It had a front-open window and two small windows in the back. The upstairs loft was accessible only on the side via a wooden stair that is no longer there. It had a wood-plank floor and door and two screened dormer windows that were latched at the front roof with a wooden handle. This upstairs area was used to store hay for the family's horses. Ms. Albright was told that family members would come by on horseback from their homes in the vicinity to get hay.

It is noteworthy that the Dawsons did not see a problem with having these smaller domiciles so close to their planned mansion only yards away. We can surmise that these rental properties were built as a source of steady income for the Dawson children, particularly the women. And, indeed, at a time when women often married out of economic necessity or for other reasons of dependency, neither Mollie nor Nannie ever married and each was often referred to as a "feme sole."

Also of note is that on most of their legal documents the Dawson family included women's names, a practice that was uncommon at the time and an indication of a forward-thinking acceptance of respectability for women. The sisters were highly educated for the time, attending the State Normal School in Huntsville. Mollie gave up her pursuit of art in order to work in real estate with her siblings. The sisters were involved in the designing of these homes.

Also of importance to the history of this neighborhood is that as early as 1900 N.A. Dawson operated a streetcar service on what is now Bouldin Ave. It was modeled after a similar rail line that was successful in transporting patrons from downtown to his West Line subdivision. This South Austin service could not be sustained, however, due to opposition from "rival interests" concerned, in part, that their wagon wheels would not be able to cross Fredericksburg Rd. (now Lamar Blvd) when Dawson's extended lines were put in.

In an obituary dated 7/7/39, the Austin American Statesman stated that "Dawson was a pioneer developer of South Austin and at the time of his death was said to be one of the largest owners of real estate in South Austin."

The house at 905 Dawson Rd. would remain in the Dawson family until 1977 when it was sold to the current owner, Veronica Albright. Ms. Albright has lived in the house continually since first becoming a tenant in October of 1975. The house was purchased from Elizabeth Tinnin Moore, the granddaughter of N.A. Dawson.

As mentioned above, a 2015 survey by Preservation Central, Inc. of the Bouldin Creek Neighborhood Association Historic Resources has rated the house at 905 Dawson Rd. as "High Preservation Priority" on a list of now less than twenty-five pre-1965 houses in this vibrant part of the central city. As Austin continues to grow and cannibalize its historic neighborhoods, houses such as this one are becoming more important in preserving some semblance of character and integrity in what remains of the city's rich history.

There were only 2 houses on Dawson in 1939, 901 & 905 the road was barely built at this time. Working class tradesmen called 905 Dawson home drivers, tradesmen, carpenter, nurses, clerks, bookmaker, often with children.

1 1940 Mrs Latham had a beauty shop listed along with her husband, a painter & 2 children. Home run shops were common ways to supplement incomes at the time. For instance Sparky Johnson who lived across the street on Ramona ran a used car/garage, his wife was a notary.

2 Mrs. Hamilton in 1944-55, a telephone operator, lived there for a decade or longer. At this time it appears 905 housed more than 1 renter/ household.

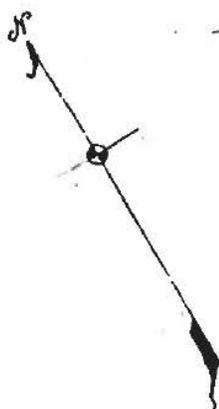

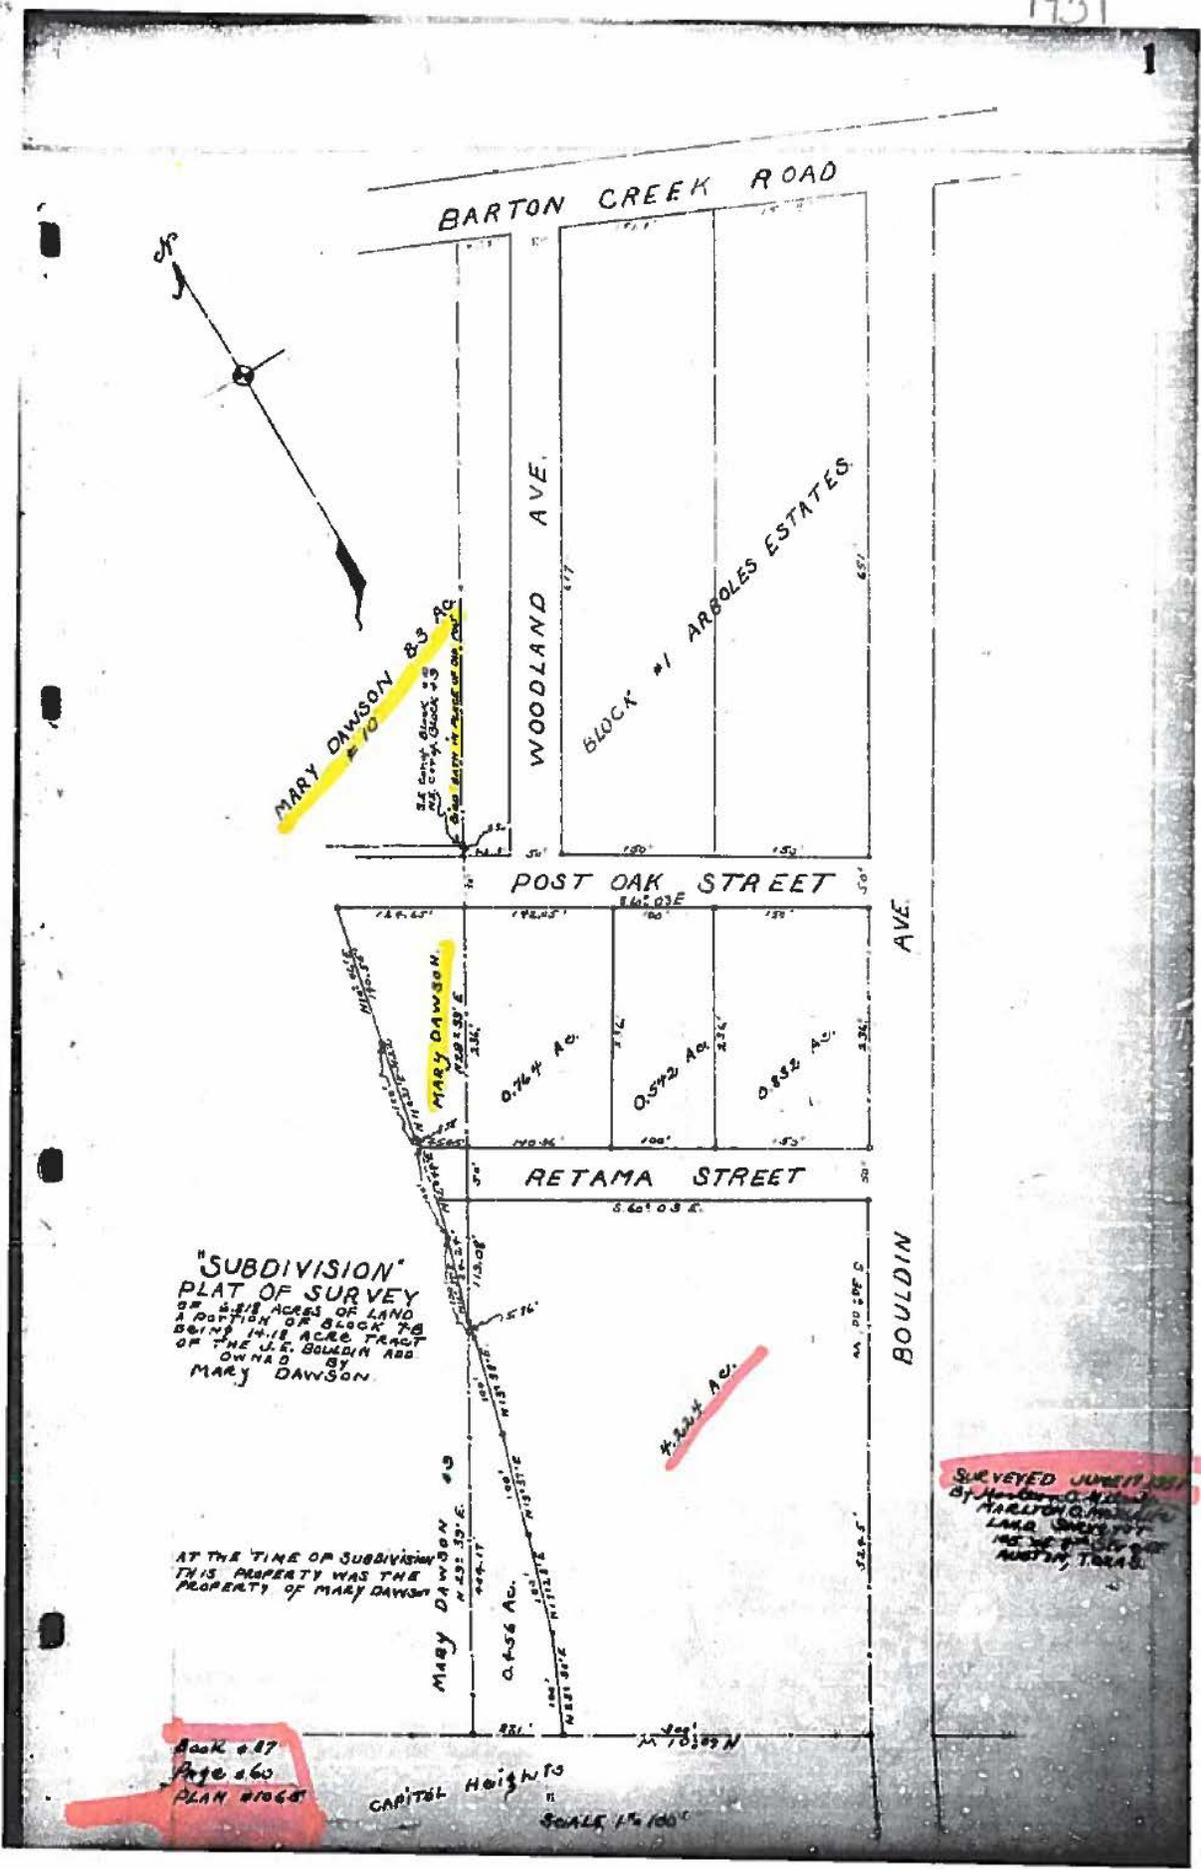

3 was vacant at least 4 times

4 and in 1975 the renters were evicted for nonpayment, making the wait to move in over 4 months. Elizabeth T. Moore the owner finally had the sheriff remove them.

5 These renters had done extensive damages to the property by burning the roof decking & garage doors, among other things.

Colorful Early Austin Resident Taken by Death

Man Who Put Street Car Line in South Austin Succumbs

Nicholas A. Dawson, owner and operator of the only street railway which operated only in South Austin, died at a local hospital at 10 a. m. Thursday.

A lifetime resident of Austin, Dawson was one of the city's most colorful and prominent figures.

He was a member of the first graduating class at A. & M. college in Bryan, and later attended the law school at the University of Texas.

About 50 years ago, Dawson represented Travis county in the state legislature for one term.

Notable Litigation

Dawson, who was 75 at the time of his death, built a streetcar track south of Congress avenue bridge in South Austin. Friends recalled that the struggle for control of the bridge across the river between him and the Austin Street railway company provided one of the most notable pieces of litigation in Travis county. The short street railway line was operated about 1900 or 1901, oldtimers here recalled.

One Austinite stated that during the dispute over the bridge, Dawson, to avoid an injunction, had a crew to lay tracks after midnight on the bridge to take his streetcar line into town.

Dawson was a pioneer developer of South Austin and at the time of his death was said to be one of the largest owners of real estate in that section of the city.

Dawson was the son of Nicholas Dawson, Sr., who was one of the original Forty-Niners in the California gold rush. He established his homestead in Travis county more than 90 years ago on the Manchaca road, where his son was residing at the time of his death. The Dawson homestead is said to be probably the oldest house in Texas, standing exactly as it did on the day of its building.

Dawson married Miss Jennie Davis, daughter of Joe Davis, one of the pioneers of Travis county, and his sister, now deceased, Miss Mollie Dawson, was one of the early teachers in the Austin public schools.

In later years Dawson abandoned the practice of law and engaged in contracting and real estate.

He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Jennie Davis Dawson; three daughters, Mrs. R. W. Herndon of Austin; Mrs. Ruth B. Tinnin of San Antonio; and Mrs. Jane D. Parker of Dallas; two sons, N. A. Dawson, Jr., of Oklahoma and Joe J. Dawson of Austin; two sisters, Miss Nannie E. Dawson of Austin and Mrs. Belle D. Daniels of San Antonio; two granddaughters, Mrs. Andrew J. Flannigan of Austin, Mrs. J. S. Ramsey of San Antonio, and a grandson, M. Dawson Tinnin of Austin.

Funeral services will be conducted at the Thurlow Weed Funeral home Friday at 6 p. m. and burial will be in the Masonic cemetery on Boggy creek.

Weeds Hide Monument To Lost Hope

Austin has landmarks and monuments to the struggles of its builders, but few if any more intriguing than the foundation of what would have been Austin's greatest mansion.

It was started by the late N. Dawson in 1892. But the pioneer South Austin builder had to ditch his plans for the mansion in a panic of 1894.

Dawson built the only street railway line in South Austin. At this time he became involved in a struggle with rival interests, and the streetcar line was abandoned.

Dawson was a difficult person to discourage. The financial panic made money scarce. Dawson refused to wait to build his mansion.

He turned to other interests, many years, finally coming back to undertake again the development of Dawson Heights. This time began by building cottages for or rent.

A few months before his death Dawson was still expecting to build his mansion. He had expected the completed structure to cost around $50,000.

His death wrote finis to the story.

What remains of that long struggle is the limestone masonry—workmanship that has withstood the ages of the elements for half a century and which is a challenge to builders of today—on one of the most commanding views of the hidden by native growth from Ton Springs road only a few feet away. It stands today as a monument of a forlorn hope.
