PROPOSAL

Demolish a ca. 1924 warehouse, now used as a restaurant.

ARCHITECTURE

One-story, rectangular-plan, flat-roofed, brick warehouse building with four original bays, now modified with fenestration and brick wainscot.

RESEARCH

The building appears to have been built in 1924. Prior to 1924, this block was occupied by a series of one-story wood buildings, some of which housed soft drink parlors run by Hispanic women, but others with more nefarious businesses. The block was adjacent to Guy Town, Austin's infamous red-light district, and perpendicular to the main set of railroad tracks, which had an east-west course through the city.

News story on the arrest of Maggie Garza, who is identified as the proprietress of a soft drink parlor at 300 Colorado Street in the 1924 city directory; a "disorderly house" was a euphemism for a brothel.

Austin Daily Statesman, June 23, 1915

Beginning in the 1920s, after the closure of the neighborhood's sporting houses and saloons, this area began to develop as a commercial area, with businesses that were either related to the railroad, such as warehouses, light industrial uses, such as bottling plants, or auto-related businesses, operating side-by-side.

There had long been a spur of the railroad that followed 4th Street, and that was the location of the earliest of the modern warehouses, such as the Merchants' Transfer Warehouse (now heavily modified as Trulucks) at the northwest corner of 4th and Colorado Streets, the Nelson Davis wholesale grocery warehouse, on the south side of the 100 block of W. 4th Street, and others, in the early 1910s. This building, at the south end of the 300 block of Colorado Street, has four large bay openings facing east onto Colorado Street, indicating an intended purpose as a warehouse, being so close to the main line of the railroad. The building reflects the early history of this section of Austin in its occupancy history: the first tenants of the building were the Electrified Water and Bottling Company, at 300 Colorado, the Auto Salvage Company at 302 Colorado, Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company at 304-06 Colorado, and a sheet metal works at 308 Colorado.

Although the companies renting these spaces changed, the uses associated with this building remained for many years. The Milwaukee Bottling Company, a beer distributorship, occupied 300 Colorado from the late 1920s through the early 1930s; the space continued to be used as a warehouse, for the Fehr Baking Company, through the early 1940s, when it then reverted back to a beer distribution warehouse. 300 Colorado was a truck storage building for Southwestern Ice and Cold Storage Company in the early 1960s, and then the headquarters for Air Conditioning, Inc. the company that purchased the entire building in the mid-1960s, and occupied it until the mid-1970s.

"TEXAS" Appreciates Quality

Grand Prize—made in Texas by a World's Master Brewer—Frantz Brogniez—has been offered the public only a short time. Yet the enthusiastic response is most gratifying.

The space at 302 Colorado Street maintained a typical use and occupancy for this neighborhood over the years as well. After the Auto Salvage Company vacated the site in the mid-1920s, the space was used by the Griffith Drug Company as their warehouse until the mid-1930s. There was a candy and cigar company's warehouse at 302 Colorado from the mid-1930s through the mid-1940s; the space was then incorporated into the beer distribution warehouse that also operated out of 300 Colorado. City directories after 1957 do not show 302 Colorado as a separate address, but it appears that the space formerly known as 302 Colorado became part of Air Conditioning, Inc. in 1967 for their headquarters.

The earliest mention of the building in the Austin newspapers dates from July, 1924 — the Austin Rifle Club had an indoor rifle range at 304 Colorado Street. Soon thereafter, the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company held the space at 304 Colorado Street from the time of construction of the building in 1925 until the early 1930s. The space was then occupied by the Texas Nut Candy Company until around 1940. Beginning in the early 1940s, this space was used for automobile-related businesses, including an auto parts warehouse, then in the mid-1940s, as an auto garage, an identity it maintained through the mid-1960s.

ARMSTRONG LEADS RIFLEMEN THURSDAY IN INDOOR SHOOT

Veteran Scores 95 Out of a Possible 100; B. J. Rupert Crowds Armstrong With 94 Score.

Tom Armstrong, veteran rifleman, was high point man Thursday night at the indoor rifle shoot of the Austin Rifle Club, held at 304 Colorado. Fifteen marksmen competed. Armstrong scored a 95 out of a possible 100. B. J. Rupert, one of the younger members of the club, pressed Armstrong closely. Rupert scored a 94 out of a possible 100.

Following the firing, it was definitely decided that in competing for the watch offered by the McKinnon Jewelry Company, the marksmen should fire the army qualification course once a month for a period of twelve months. The members were divided into three groups, designated as A, B and C. This division will permit the inexperienced rifleman in Group C to have just as good a chance as the veteran marksman in Group A, for the man in Group C will not be expected to shoot as high, and will be graded higher on his actual scoring than the veteran marksman.

The spaces at 306 and 308 Colorado reflect a trend from light industrial use to auto-related business. 308 Colorado originally housed a sheet metal business. Around 1930, all of this space was used by Goodyear Tire and Rubber, but soon thereafter, Goodyear left this building, and the northern portion of this building (308) was home to a plumbing supply warehouse. The plumbing supply company moved into its own building around the corner in 1937, was followed by a Venetian blind manufacturing company, and by 1940, there was an electrical equipment manufacturer at 306 Colorado, and an auto body shop at 308 Colorado. Cal Marshall operated his auto body shop at this location until around 1960. Southwestern Ice and Cold Storage, which had their headquarters across the street at the now-demolished building that also had served as the Coca-Cola Bottling Plant, had a truck storage facility in this building at 306 Colorado in the 1940s and 1950s. The entire building was used as the headquarters for Air Conditioning, Inc. in the mid-1960s, but by the mid-1970s, there were individual businesses operating here once again.

Tire Company Opens Wholesale House

Austin received its first direct wholesale supply depot Thursday, when announcement was made that the Goodyear Tire and Rubber company of Akron, would open up headquarters within the next few days at 304 and 306 Colorado street, the two brick buildings being taken under lease for a consideration of $25,000. E. B. McAllister of Akron and San Antonio will be in charge.

The transaction was handled through the Paul O. Simms company, the owners of the building being Donnelly & White.

Active remodeling work is now going on, and the doors will be thrown open within a few days.

The Goodyear company has large wholesale branches of this kind in other Texas cities of considerable size, San Antonio, Dallas, Fort Worth and Houston, being among the cities with depots.

This modest building tells the story of the conversion of the delivery and storage of goods in Austin from the time of its construction in the mid-1920s through the mid-1960s, when the railroad and trucking companies moved out of downtown. The transformation of this space from warehouses to auto-related businesses coincided with the replacement of the railroad by trucking firms in Austin's consumer economy. The old train passenger depots at 3rd and Congress were torn down and the new passenger station was built west of Lamar Boulevard on 3rd Street in the late 1940s. Without the railroad, older warehouse buildings changed tenants, and while there were a few trucking firms remaining downtown, most located on the outskirts, closer to the highways. The void was filled by auto-related businesses, including auto body shops, transmission repair shops, auto parts stores and warehouses, and others. In the not-so distant past, the west side of downtown, including the area north and west of this building, was characterized by the large number of car dealers, auto repair shops, and other auto-related businesses, especially south of 6th Street. This building represents that history.

Since the mid-1980s, there has been a resurgence of interest and vitality in downtown Austin, especially in the area now referred to as the Warehouse District. Bars, restaurants, theaters, and other businesses opened in the old warehouse buildings, and the popularity and ambience of the area is defined by the historic character of the modest brick buildings.

STAFF COMMENTS

The building was listed as a Priority 1 for research in the Comprehensive Cultural Resources Survey (1984). The building was also identified as significant in the cultural resources study for the Downtown Austin Plan, and in several workshops and symposia for the preservation of the Warehouse District over the last 10 years. The Downtown Austin Plan did not include this building in its core identification of the Warehouse District, which unfortunately encompasses only the 200 block of W. 4th Street.

The building's conversion to the restaurant use in the mid-1990s resulted in modifications to the façade, including infilling the original garage bays with brick and fenestration, and sand-blasting to remove the white paint applied in the 1960s. A good percentage of the brick on the front of the building is not original.

Staff believes that the building has historical significance, despite the changes to the historic fabric of the building. While staff generally goes through an evaluation of the ways that the building does or does not meet the criteria for designation as a historic landmark at this point in the report, because staff is going to request either initiation of the historic zoning case or a postponement of this case in order to fully assess and compare the significance of this building with others in the warehouse district, that evaluation will come at a later date with greater information.

- a. Architecture. The building is a brick ca. 1925 warehouse building with utilitarian architecture; much of the brick on the façade has been replaced and the original garage bays have been infilled. However, the building does retain sufficient integrity to convey its historic appearance and identity as a warehouse.
- b. Historical association. The building has had no individually-significant associations through the panoply of tenants over the years, but does represent the history of this section of downtown and the rise and fall of the importance of track-side warehouses in Austin.
- c. Archaeology. The building was not evaluated for its potential to yield significant data concerning the human history or prehistory of the region.
- d. Community value. The building does possess a unique location that contributes to the character, image, or cultural identity of the city, the neighborhood, or a particular demographic group.
- e. Landscape feature. The property is not a significant natural or designed landscape with artistic, aesthetic, cultural, or historical value to the city.

STAFF RECOMMENDATION

Initiate historic zoning or postpone until September 25, 2017 to fully evaluate options for the future of this building. This building is too important to the character of the Warehouse District to not entertain and evaluate options other than strict demolition.

Earlier directories show that Domenico Millicio had a restaurant at 302 Colorado Street in 1907, and lived next door. The remaining addresses on this end of the block were all residences of Hispanic families. Mike Falcone had the Two Brothers Saloon at 300 Colorado Street in 1905; the Palace Saloon was at 308 Colorado Street with residences in between.

The building was renovated for Sullivan's Restaurant in 1995-96; Sullivan's expanded into the southern half of the building in 1997 with the opening of Ringside at Sullivan's.

The 1900 Sanborn map shows a series of one-story commercial buildings along the 300 block of Colorado Street; none of these remain.

The 1935 Sanborn map shows the current building in the 300 block of Colorado Street housing a warehouse at 300, wholesale tobaccos at 302, a candy factory at 304, a private garage at 306, and wholesale plumbing supplies at 308 Colorado. The 1935 city directory listing show Fehr Baking Company's warehouse at 300 Colorado, a cigar and candy company at 302, the Texas Nut Candy Company at 304, 306 being vacant, and Donnelly-White wholesale plumbing supplies at 308 Colorado.

The 1961 Sanborn map shows the addresses of 300 and 302 Colorado combined into one space as a private garage, auto supplies and repairs at 304, a private garage at 306, and auto repairs and painting at 308. City directories in the early 1960s show that Southwestern Ice and Cold Storage maintained a truck storage facility at 300-02, Aus-Tex Engine Rebuilders was at 304, Southwestern Ice and Cold Storage maintained another garage at 306, and Cal Marshall's Body Shop was at 308 Colorado.
