Contract Audit: Youth Harvest Foundation

May 2018

The City's two current contracts with the African American Youth Harvest Foundation were not developed or monitored to ensure payments were warranted and performance measures were met. Several issues with the language in the contracts made it difficult for Austin Public Health to provide effective monitoring. However, even considering the limitations of the contracts, Austin Public Health's monitoring process was ineffective for these contracts. A review of expense documentation from three months indicates that the Youth Harvest Foundation appears to have overcharged the City over $18,600 in that time period. Additionally, Austin Public Health cannot verify that the Youth Harvest Foundation satisfied the intended purpose of one of the contracts.

Objective

The objective of this audit was to determine whether the City developed and monitored the two current contracts with the African American Youth Harvest Foundation in the best interests of the City.

Background

The City has two contracts with the African American Youth Harvest Foundation (Youth Harvest Foundation) to provide services for youth and families. Both contracts were developed and are managed by Austin Public Health (APH). Since 2014, the City has paid the Youth Harvest Foundation approximately $920,000 under these contracts. Exhibits 1 & 2 have more details about the two contracts.

The Youth Resource Center contract was awarded as part of APH's 2014 Social Services contract procurement effort. During this process, APH staff did not recommend that the City fund this contract. However, the City Council's Health and Human Services Committee added the Youth Resource Center contract, along with several other contracts, to the list of agreements to be funded. The most recent Conferences contract was awarded following an African American Resource Advisory Commission recommendation.

What We Found

Summary

The City's two current contracts with the African American Youth Harvest Foundation were not developed or monitored to ensure payments were warranted and performance measures were met. Several issues with the language in the contracts made it difficult for Austin Public Health to provide effective monitoring. However, even considering the limitations of the contracts, Austin Public Health's monitoring process was ineffective for these contracts. A review of expense documentation from three months indicates that the Youth Harvest Foundation appears to have overcharged the City over $18,600 in that time period. Additionally, Austin Public Health cannot verify that the Youth Harvest Foundation satisfied the intended purpose of one of the contracts.

Finding 1

The City's contracts with the Youth Harvest Foundation make it difficult for Austin Public Health to effectively monitor the contracts.

The contracts do not require that the Youth Harvest Foundation provide actual receipts, bank statements, or payroll records.

There are two main sections in the City's contracts with the Youth Harvest Foundation. The first section includes the City's standard contract terms and conditions, and the second section includes information about the particular program.¹ Both of the Youth Harvest Foundation contracts appear to align with the City's contract development requirements. However, these requirements did not result in contracts that APH could effectively monitor, as detailed below.

Processing payments

Both contracts require that the Youth Harvest Foundation submit supporting documentation when requesting payment. However, the only supporting documentation required is a report from the Youth Harvest Foundation's internal accounting system. The contracts do not require that the Youth Harvest Foundation provide actual receipts, bank statements, or payroll records. The contract lists these documents as optional, and the contracts specify that APH may request them. However, APH staff did not appear to request these documents before processing payment.² Without these documents, it would be difficult for APH staff to ensure that the Youth Harvest Foundation is requesting reimbursement for actual expenses.

The lack of a requirement for supporting documents showing actual expenses is critical since some of the programs the City funded were also funded by other organizations. The Youth Harvest Foundation was required to disclose their other sources of funding when they submitted their Youth Resource Center contract application. However, there does not appear to be a requirement that they specify in monthly payment requests what the other sources were paying for. The Youth Resource Center contract listed at least two other organizations that were partially funding programs listed in that contract. Without knowing how the Youth Harvest Foundation was using funds from those other organizations, there is an increased risk that the City could reimburse the Youth Harvest Foundation for expenses that were also reimbursed by other organizations.

Performance measures

Because the contract allowed the Youth Harvest Foundation to count other organizations' clients as their own, contract monitoring staff stated that they could not determine how many clients the Youth Harvest Foundation directly served.

In addition to issues with supporting documentation, the performance measures in the Youth Resource Center contract do not allow APH to determine how many clients are directly served with City funds. This contract explicitly allows the Youth Harvest Foundation to count clients served by other agencies, and there is no requirement that the Youth Harvest Foundation distinguish between the number of clients they served and the number served by these other agencies. APH staff tasked with monitoring this contract stated they could not determine how many clients the Youth Harvest Foundation directly served. As a result, it is unclear how effectively the Youth Harvest Foundation is spending City money serving clients.

Finding 2

Even if the two contracts with the Youth Harvest Foundation had been developed to allow effective monitoring, Austin Public Health's monitoring process is ineffective.

Although there were issues with the terms of the Youth Harvest Foundation contracts as noted in Finding 1, APH did not effectively monitor these contracts. As detailed below, there were issues with how APH monitored Youth Harvest Foundation's financials and performance measures, as well as APH's general monitoring operations. As a result, the Youth Harvest Foundation appeared to overcharge the City $18,600 over a three month period reviewed during the audit.

Issues with monitoring financials

According to the primary APH staff member responsible for monitoring the Youth Harvest Foundation contracts, the Youth Harvest Foundation usually only submitted a profit-and-loss statement to support monthly requests for payment.³ These statements did not contain sufficient details to verify that the Youth Harvest Foundation actually incurred expenses for which it was requesting reimbursement, and APH staff did not request additional documentation.

As an example, the Youth Resource Center contract specified that the City would only pay 10% of the full-time wages of certain positions at the Youth Harvest Foundation.⁴ However, the profit-and-loss statements listed salary as a single line item, which meant APH employees could not verify adherence to this requirement. The manager for the workgroup approving payments stated that staff did not check whether this provision was followed for payment requests.

In another example, the same contract listed the specific positions that the City was funding and the Youth Harvest Foundation's Executive Director was not included in this list. During the three months of expenses reviewed, the Youth Harvest Foundation included about $13,000 of the ³ As noted in Finding 1, they were not required to submit actual receipts, bank statements, or payroll records.

⁴ This provision was removed in later amendments to the contract.

Executive Director's salary in the wages and salaries expense line item, which was approved for payment by APH. Although it was not listed in the program budget, another section of the contract states that compensation for a "director acting in an executive capacity" is an allowable expense. It is unclear if this section supersedes the program budget.

It appears that the Youth Harvest Foundation overcharged the City over $18,600 for wages and salaries during a three month period reviewed for this audit. The profit-and-loss statements the Youth Harvest Foundation submitted during that quarter claimed total salary and wages of approximately $58,000. However, the Youth Harvest Foundation's general ledger indicates less than $40,000 of labor costs were allocated to the two City contracts during that time. (See Exhibit 3.)

It appears that the Youth Harvest Foundation overcharged the City over $18,600 for wages and salaries during a three month period.

Exhibit 3: Comparison of "Salaries and Wages" on Profit-and-Loss Statements as Reported by Youth Harvest Foundation to Youth Harvest Foundation's General Ledger, October-December 2016

Other potential issues included reimbursement for a gasoline purchase made outside of Travis County and the addition of a personal vehicle to the Youth Harvest Foundation's commercial auto insurance policy.⁵

⁵ This addition occurred outside of our sample period and insurance payments were not reviewed.

Issues with monitoring performance

Although the Youth Harvest Foundation was required to submit performance information on a quarterly basis, APH staff stated that they only attempted to verify reported performance totals during the annual site visit. This means that APH paid the Youth Harvest Foundation for 12 months without attempting to verify reported performance.

During the 2017 site visit, APH staff reviewed less than 1% of the number of clients the Youth Harvest Foundation was expected to serve.

Additionally, there were several issues with the process APH staff used to verify the Youth Harvest Foundation's reported performance. For example, APH staff reviewed only three client files related to the Youth Resource Center contract during the 2017 site visit. This represents less than 1% of the number of clients the Youth Harvest Foundation was expected to serve under that contract during the year. APH staff asserted that future reviews would involve a larger number of client files.

The Youth Harvest Foundation was unable to provide complete documentation to support the number of unduplicated clients served that they previously reported.

Another issue is that APH staff appeared to tell the Youth Harvest Foundation which client files would be reviewed prior to the visit. Although APH policy requires staff to notify contractors about the scope of the site visit, providing information about the specific files to be reviewed gives contractors the opportunity to conceal irregularities and modify documentation. During this audit, the Youth Harvest Foundation was unable to provide complete documentation to support the number of unduplicated clients served that they previously reported to APH.

General monitoring operations

APH has two workgroups tasked with monitoring contracts. The Contract Management workgroup is responsible for the day-to-day monitoring of contracts. The Contract Compliance Unit is responsible for, among other things, monitoring contracts that APH deems as high risk. Each workgroup has a manual to guide its contract monitoring activities, which outline different monitoring "levels" for contracts. According to the Contract Management manual, which is currently undergoing revision, monitoring levels may be raised as a result of missed report deadlines or inaccurate reports, and specific actions are taken when a contract's level is raised.⁶ At the highest level, Contract Management is supposed to refer the contract to the Contract Compliance Unit.

Information about the designated monitoring levels for the Youth Harvest Foundation contracts was inconsistent. The APH employee directly assigned to monitor the Youth Resource Center contract stated that it was at the highest level. This was confirmed in the contract management system. However, the Contract Management manager stated the contract was at the lowest monitoring level. Additionally, the Contract Management manager asserted that actions required to raise the monitoring level had not taken place.

APH's contracts with the Youth Harvest Foundation require that the Youth

⁶ In addition to notifying the Contract Compliance Unit when monitoring levels are increased, Contract Management staff must also prepare a Corrective Action Plan and require additional supporting documentation from the contractor.

A recent audit by another governmental entity found that the Youth Harvest Foundation had overcharged them $49,000. After that, the entity canceled their contract with the Youth Harvest Foundation.

Harvest Foundation provide copies of monitoring reports from other sources of funding. When submitting quarterly performance reports, the Youth Harvest Foundation is required to note if they have received any such reports.⁷ During the 2017 site visit, APH staff learned that the Youth Harvest Foundation had been audited by another government entity. This audit, which was finalized in September, found that the Youth Harvest Foundation had overcharged the entity $49,000 and resulted in the entity canceling its contract with the Youth Harvest Foundation. Although the site visit occurred more than a month later in October, Youth Harvest Foundation staff indicated to APH that the report had not been finalized. APH staff did not appear to contact the other government entity after learning this information.

In January, the Youth Harvest Foundation submitted a quarterly performance report to APH. On this report, Youth Harvest Foundation staff indicated that they had not received a monitoring report from another entity. The APH employees who were present during the October site visit reviewed this report, but there is no indication that anyone at APH followed up on this response or attempted to obtain the audit report from the Youth Harvest Foundation.

⁷ APH has added an additional request for monitoring reports to the monthly payment request form that agencies complete.

Additional observations

Issues identified in this audit may not be unique to the Youth Harvest Foundation Contracts.

This report identified issues with general contract language and APH's policies and procedures for contract development and monitoring. As a result, these issues may also exist with other contracts developed and managed by APH. Although the recommendations in this report apply specifically to the Youth Harvest Foundation contracts, it may be in APH's best interest to evaluate how they apply to other existing and future contracts.

Recommendations and Management Response

The Director of APH should ensure that payments made under both Youth Harvest Foundation contracts were appropriate, and seek reimbursement for any payments made for unallowable or unjustified expenses claimed by the Youth Harvest Foundation.

Management Response: Agree

Proposed Implementation Plan: APH staff will review payments made to the Youth Harvest Foundation under both the Youth Resource Center and Conferences agreements to ensure expenses billed were justified and allowable. For any unjustified or unallowable expenses found, APH will seek reimbursement.

Proposed Implementation Date: October 1, 2018

The Director of APH should ensure more effective monitoring of the Youth Harvest Foundation contracts by:

- Requesting additional supporting documentation related to payment requests;
- Contacting other funders directly to obtain monitoring reports;
- Not informing the Youth Harvest Foundation in advance about the specific scope of on-site monitoring; and
- Ensuring staff responsible for monitoring the Youth Harvest Foundation contracts have an appropriate understanding of the purposes of their role.

Management Response: Agree

Proposed Implementation Plan: Current APH Contract Management and Contract Compliance Unit monitoring procedures do require grantees to submit supporting documentation on payment requests as deemed necessary, or on a sample basis; grantees acknowledge receipt of monitoring reports from external funders, and provide copies to Austin Public Health.

APH will modify the Department's current monitoring procedures to ensure:

- adequate supporting documentation is obtained from the Youth Harvest Foundation to determine if expenses billed to APH are justified and allowable,
- once a grantee acknowledges receipt of monitoring report from external funder, report will be obtained either voluntarily from the grantee, or directly from funder,
- limited notice of specific scope of future monitoring engagements.

Training and technical assistance will be provided to Contract Managers to ensure they have a clear understanding of the purposes of their roles.

Proposed Implementation Date: October 1, 2018
